She blows out the light and runs downstairs and out into the warm, silent garden. Mrs. Simpson has - run in at some neighbor s; Nan, with half a dozen other young people, has gone to the village to hear the baud play in the square before the hotel. The house is dark below; her father s study-lamp glimmers faintly through the closed blinds. Lydia sits down for a moment upon a seat and listens. The road is deserted, not a sound is to be heard. She idles down the path, stoops to smell at a clump of day-lilies, looks up and down the road, and comes slowly back again, humming a tune. Eight o clock strikes. So...
