CHAPTER IV A GREAT-GRANDSON OF SHAMAWNA The South Beach stretched east and west, a ribbon of sand in hot loneliness, edging a green sea. Lieutenant Hawthorne apparently had the coast to himself, except for a cloud of gulls and an old wreck. He walked close to the small waves--the tide was far ebbed--and smoked his pipe, and thought of about a thousand different things, but one in particular. The brilliant June afternoon, with its wide still calm and its fragrance, lay warmly glowing about him. In its gentle influence it seemed to him like all the summer Sunday afternoons he had ever known. They had been spent in vastly varying places, but he had always recognized in each a constant quality. In the sleepy quiet of his mother's unforgotten garden when-- a very little boy--he had swung on the front gate while she napped sabbatically upstairs, in the suspended activity of a battleship's quarterdeck with the ocean a hot blue lake, even in the unchallenged gaiety of an Eastern seventh day, there had always been, for him, a faint flavor of something that was distinctively Sunday afternoon, at home, in June. This phenomenon was comparable, he often thought, to the constant factor in everything beautiful-- the quality identical in such widely differing things as, for instance, deep green untroubled water, Diana in marble, Gothic spires washed with rain, an old tune sung under the night sky. And now the unnamable comfort...
