It is common for girls who are themselves going to school to take their younger brothers or sisters to the Infant school, and this reason alone is sufficient to indicate the advisability of these two entrances not being too far apart. Again, when the school is dismissed, the boyish element is apt to be hilarious somewhat at the expense of anything coming in the way, and children only just beyond the walking age are better out of range. In rough neighbourhoods the lower part of the door should be covered with strong sheet iron, able to bear successfully the perpetual kicking which it is sure to receive. The principal entrance should always have a bell communicating directly with the caretaker s rooms. Also a letter box. Staircases.--Every department of a school, above the level of the ground floor, should have a separate staircase, and, if of very large size, even two separate staircases. Such arrangement will tend to avoid confusion among the children. It is also desirable that the separation shall be so complete as to render almost impossible any dispute or rivalry in jurisdiction between the various masters or mistresses in charge of the several departments. It is important in the case of large schools to be able to discharge the occupants of one set of class-rooms, or to allow a single child to go out, without disturbing the entire school. Perhaps it may be laid down, generally, that where the number reaches...
